- High-level participation: 47 ministers and 40 vice ministers

Key Conclusions from the HLD

We're all in this together

- Migration is a growing global phenomenon affecting all states whether as countries of origin, destination or transit, or all three.

There is a link between migration and development

- International migration can be a positive force for development in countries of origin and destination. It needs to be mainstreamed into development policies and Poverty Reduction Strategy Programs (PRSPs).

Migrants have human rights

- International migration, development and human rights are interconnected. Respect for migrants' human rights is essential in order to benefit fully from international migration.

International community needs to cooperate at all levels

- National strategies on migration and development should be complemented by strengthened bilateral, regional, and multilateral cooperation

Outcomes of the HLD

- Realization that open and constructive debate about migration and development at global level between sending and receiving states is possible
- Proposal by the UN Secretary General for the states to continue the dialogue
- Agreement by the states to convene a Global Forum on Migration and Development (GFMD)
