Gender and Indigenous Peoples: Overview

Indigenous women face significant challenges to the full enjoyment of their human rights. Indigenous women experience multiple forms of discrimination, often lack access to education, health care and ancestral lands, face disproportionately high rates of poverty and are subjected to violence, such as domestic violence and sexual abuse, including in the contexts of trafficking and armed conflict. As the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues (UNPFII) has stated, globalization presents additional challenges in many parts of the world. Indigenous women’s roles have eroded due to the compounding factors of loss of natural resources and depletion of the ecosystems, their transformation into cash economies, changes in local, social and decision-making structures, and their lack of political status within States.

In spite of the specific challenges facing indigenous women, there is often a reluctance to address the gender dimensions of indigenous peoples’ issues, as to do so is seen as “interfering with culture” or “imposing western values”. However, from socioeconomic and poverty reduction perspectives, gender analysis is a means by which to identify and address gender-differentiated needs in a more accurate and targeted way.

Indigenous women have organized at local, national and international levels to address the specific issues and challenges that they face. At the United Nations, indigenous women have been advocates and leaders since the very first year of the Working Group on Indigenous Populations, in 1982 in Geneva, Switzerland. Indigenous women were active participants and contributors during the more than two decades of negotiations regarding the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, which was adopted by the General Assembly in September 2007. The human rights of indigenous women are protected by all of the provisions of the UN Declaration, which also calls for particular attention to be paid to their rights and special needs, and calls upon States to take measures to ensure that indigenous women enjoy the full protection and guarantees against all forms of violence and discrimination.

As a result of their advocacy, indigenous women also ensured that a resolution on indigenous women was adopted at the 49th Session of the Commission of the Status of the Women (CSW) in March 2005, which is the first ever on indigenous women by this body. It is now clear that indigenous women are claiming gender equality and the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action.

Why are gender issues important to indigenous peoples?

“Indigenous Peoples carry a fragile but essential part of our common humanity. As individuals and societies, they represent an irreplaceable diversity. Participation in development should not mean absorption into the mainstream – on the contrary, our task is to ensure that the human rights and human potential of Indigenous Peoples receive the needed attention; that development policies recognize the unique contribution and capacity of Indigenous Peoples; that policymakers understand the Millennium Development Goals and the concept of development in ways which support and engage with indigenous culture, and that we become partners in a common enterprise.”

In different societies and cultures, different values and norms attached to men and women assign them different statuses. Norms and values generally attached to men and women of colonial and dominant cultures, such as purity and pollution, liability and asset, dependent and breadwinner, have segregated women and men.
In indigenous communities, men and women have different gender roles and responsibilities and for that reason they also often have different needs, desires and interests. Traditionally, indigenous women were generally respected by indigenous men and had equal access to and control over collective land and natural resources. However, with the gradual loss of collective ownership of lands and other natural resources and the introduction by dominant outsiders of institutions of private property, indigenous women progressively lost their traditional rights to lands and natural resources. The following has been a familiar pattern in many indigenous communities: As the indigenous economy, guided by the values of generalized reciprocity, symbolic complementarity and customary laws that cherish gender equity and equality, weakened, male members of some indigenous communities became sole inheritors of lands and other property. As a result, female members have been deprived of their rights of traditional access to lands and other resources.

There are exceptions provided by some indigenous matriarchal and other societies. For example, in some indigenous communities of South and South-East Asia, including indigenous nationalities of Nepal and certain tribes of India, Thailand and Cambodia, women enjoy a high social position and their status is not low in comparison to their male counterparts. Property is owned by both men and women in the communities of matriarchal Tharus of India, and women spend their income freely without any advice from their men relatives. In several matrilineal tribes such as Khasi, Garo and Jaintia of North-Eastern hills of India, women are entitled to hold exclusive land rights and inherit ancestral properties. However, their elevated status within the family is not reflected in the bigger politico-rural canvas of the society. Certain influences of colonial and dominant cultures and traditions on indigenous peoples have placed indigenous women in a difficult situation in terms of playing effective roles as custodians of their cultures.

The human development index of many countries shows that the socio-economic gap between indigenous peoples and non-indigenous peoples is increasing. A similar trend is seen in human development and empowerment between indigenous women and men. The gap between indigenous women and dominant group women is even wider. Gender, or the social, cultural and psychological patterning of differences between males and females, did not used to be a prominent aspect of the lives of indigenous peoples. However, with increasing inter-cultural contacts, the accelerating pace of marketization of indigenous economies, rapid expansion of communications and other technologies, the spread of state institutions and development actions and inescapable mainstream socialization and urbanization, gender has become an important factor and has destabilized indigenous women’s status, disintegrated their identity and worsened their life conditions.

How does the application of a gender perspective make a difference to indigenous peoples?

Gender mainstreaming, a strategy to reduce disparities between men and women, involves ensuring that gender perspectives and attention to the goal of gender equality are central to all activities. Gender equality is not only the concern of women, but of men and boys too. This was highlighted by Ole Henrik Magga, former Chairperson of the UNPFII, who, when speaking at the high level panel at the third session of the Permanent Forum, stated: “So often it seems to me that an important role of indigenous peoples in the global debates of our times is to remind us all of what we may have forgotten, (that) indigenous cultures rely on gender complementarity — a symbiosis, which values both women’s business and men’s business — a complementarity that ensures both mutual respect and balance”.

Mainstreaming a gender perspective in development initiatives can make a real difference. For instance, indigenous men’s and women’s situations can be better understood through the analysis of gender disaggregated data (qualitative and quantitative). Based on their needs assessment and their development priorities, various programs such as awareness raising, social mobilization, organization building, training, saving and credit schemes, income generation, functional literacy and cultural revitalization, will be prepared and implemented with their full participation.

When indigenous women manage institutions, resources and development initiatives, they enhance and improve their social and economic situation. Gender-blind approaches to development fail to address the issues and problems of indigenous women.

After the 1995 World Conference on Women in Beijing, some governments amended discriminatory laws to improve the position of women. However, many States still maintain discriminatory laws. Changes in these will bring positive changes for indigenous women. The application of a gender perspective can improve the distressing situation of indigenous women caused by multiple oppressions: as indigenous persons, as women, and as members of the poorer classes of society. It is necessary to adopt appropriate strategies for their empowerment and social inclusion, with due respect to their cultures, ways of life, traditions and customary laws, emphasizing the protection and full enjoyment of their human rights and fundamental freedoms as women and members of an indigenous community.

What are the key issues to be considered when discussing gender and indigenous peoples?
The status of indigenous women differs from one community to another and from one region to another. Yet, their concerns often coincide because of their indigenous status. The experiences of and challenges facing indigenous women throughout the world are often similar in terms of poverty, human rights violations, lack of access to education, health care and socio-economic development.

Multiple discrimination: Indigenous women face multiple discrimination on the basis of sex, race/ethnicity, language, culture, religion and class. For instance, indigenous women in one country are called “third class citizens” because of their inferior status in relation to men and in relation to non-indigenous people. Concerns regarding racial discrimination faced by indigenous women were raised by indigenous women at the 1995 World Conference on Women. In 2004, the UNPFII took note of the fact that the United Nations Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) does not make specific reference to indigenous women and recommended that “special attention should be paid to the issues related to maintaining the integrity of indigenous women and the gender dimension of racial discrimination against indigenous peoples”.

Violence: Indigenous peoples suffer from violence and conflict in many parts of the world. Indigenous women are particularly vulnerable to such violence both within their own communities and in the broader society. Indigenous women experience many kinds of violence in times of peace and war, including female genital mutilation, forced marriages, early marriages, polygamy, beating and forced labour. Indigenous women are trafficked for prostitution and forced labour. In some cases, they are treated as exotic, decorative, sexual objects and study-objects by media and the communications system. Such concerns have been highlighted at the United Nations Working Group on Indigenous Populations and the UNPFII.

Globalization and development: Globalization and economic liberalization have often destroyed indigenous subsistence economies and displaced indigenous peoples from their land. Indigenous women have lost their livelihoods due to the impact of globalization on natural resources and as their products have been replaced by manufactured goods. Poverty has contributed to displacement of indigenous communities. Indigenous men move from their communities in search of work, in some cases leaving women and children behind. There has also been an increase in migration of indigenous women, in search of employment, to cities, where they face the danger of exploitation and inhumane treatment. In many countries indigenous peoples are displaced from their lands due to the construction of highways, dams, mines and the establishment of national parks. Forced migration has led to destruction of indigenous lifestyles and compounded the problems faced by indigenous women.

Other common issues: Indigenous women from both developed and developing States suffer from poor health due to poor sanitary facilities, lack of clean drinking water and other basic needs for sustaining healthy life. Indigenous peoples of developed countries in some instances live in hazardous conditions due to nuclear testing and nuclear waste storage in their territories. Indigenous women from Africa, Asia and Latin America face water born diseases. Their access to health care services and facilities is restricted because health care policies and programmes treat all women as a homogenous group. Indigenous women and men are deprived of educational opportunities because of lack of mother tongue education, geographical barriers to accessing schools as well as economic obstacles. Such barriers are more stringent for indigenous women, who also face gender-based discrimination. Similarly, indigenous men and women have very low participation in decision-making bodies, politics and employment. Even in indigenous communities, decision-making is gradually becoming a man’s domain.

What are the practical implications of applying a gender perspective to indigenous peoples’ issues?

The application of a gender perspective to indigenous peoples’ issues will have several practical implications. They can be summarized as follows:

- The role of indigenous women as custodians of culture, language and beliefs will be strengthened and their status will be respected by society. They will be able to strengthen their roles in the protection of the environment and biodiversity.
- With the raising of multiple consciousnesses among indigenous women, differences in experiencing gender between indigenous women and women of dominant groups in many respects will be eventually narrowed. Oppressions and discriminations based on sex, race, caste or ethnicity, class and sexual orientation will be reduced. This will also enhance the image of indigenous peoples.
- The capacity of indigenous women to participate in policy formation will be enhanced.
- The economic, political, cultural, educational and health status of indigenous women will be improved. The elevated status of indigenous women will also contribute to improvements in the life conditions of indigenous peoples.
- The claims of indigenous peoples for land rights, the right to natural resources and right to self-determination, consultation, participation and special representation will be more forceful and compelling.
- Violence against indigenous women will decrease and they will effectively exercise their agency to get rid of sexist, racist and other forms of oppressions.
- Development programs will be in consultation and cooperation with indigenous peoples and will therefore be more equitable and capable of appropriately addressing indigenous peoples’ issues. Development planners will take into account the people targeted by development activities.
What are some of the challenges that need to be addressed concerning gender and indigenous peoples?

Some of the challenges that need to be addressed concerning gender and indigenous peoples are the following:

1. The dominant gender-neutral conception of equality prevailing in countries where indigenous peoples live has not been adequate in addressing the multiple disadvantages of indigenous women. It has become a daunting task in each country to repeal policies and practices that diminish opportunities for indigenous women and perpetuate their disempowerment.

2. Demolishing structural barriers to eliminate complex oppressions experienced by indigenous women is the major challenge for indigenous peoples throughout the world.

3. The reluctance of many States to implement international human rights conventions is a major hurdle in overcoming educational, health, vocational/economic, and political disadvantages for indigenous women. Denial of indigenous peoples’ rights has disenfranchised women severely relative to male members of indigenous peoples in most countries.

4. The removal of structural barriers to achieving a multi-cultural democracy is one of the foremost challenges for gender equality that will impact indigenous women.

References

1. E/C.19/2004/23, para. 3
5. Marisela Padron-Quero, Director, Latin America and the Caribbean Division, Speaking remarks on behalf of UNFPA to the Fifth Session of the UNPFII.
6. Generalized reciprocity refers to distribution of goods and services by direct sharing without immediate expectation of return. No direct form of repayment is involved in this pattern of exchange of goods and services, but are expected that others will be equally generous. (Howard, Michael C., Contemporary Cultural Anthropology. New York, Harper Collins Publisher 1989, Third Edition, pag. 147).
7. Symbiotic complementarily refers to that pattern of relationships between different systems of production that complement each other providing goods and services needed by the other without one dominating the other. (Howard, 1989: 156).

For further information please contact:

The Secretariat of the Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues, Division for Social Policy and Development
United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs, United Nations,
2 UN Plaza, Room DC2-1454
New York, NY, 10017
Tel: 1 917 367 5100 | Fax: 1 917 367 5102 | Email: indigenous_un@un.org

Prepared by the Secretariat of the Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues in collaboration with the Office of the Special Adviser on Gender Issues and the Division for the Advancement of Women