27 February – 10 March 2006

Item 3 of the provisional agenda

Follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women and to the special session of the General Assembly entitled “Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century”

Advance Unedited Version

The situation of women and girls in AfghanistanSummary*

The present report provides an update of the situation of women and girls in Afghanistan in 2005, in response to Economic and Social Council resolution 2005/8, with particular focus on the electoral process, efforts to promote and protect the rights of women and girls, social and economic reconstruction and rehabilitation. It includes information on activities undertaken by the United Nations system in support of the Afghan Government’s work towards the advancement of women and gender equality. While significant gains have been made by Afghan women and girls, including in the legal, political and educational areas, progress is not felt in all parts of the country and the gender development indicators remain among the worst in the world. Continuous and wide-spread incidents of human rights violations and violence against women call for prompt and enhanced action by the Afghan government and the international

* The submission of the present report was delayed due to the need for further consultations with relevant United Nations entities.

I. Introduction

1. The present report is submitted in compliance with paragraph 6 of Economic and Social Council resolution 2005/8 on the situation of women and girls in Afghanistan.

2. The report updates information on political, social and economic developments affecting Afghan women since the last report dated 22 December 2004 (E/CN.6/2005/5). It draws on information provided, inter alia, by the United Nations system¹ and concludes with a set of recommendations.

3. The gains made by Afghan women in previous years, including in the legal, political and educational areas, are significant, given the oppression from which they emerged in late 2001. Progress made in stabilizing Afghanistan's system of governance contributed to the enhancement of women's participation in the political process. Nevertheless, women and girls in Afghanistan remain beset with formidable security, economic, social and human rights challenges. Afghanistan's first human development report "Security with a Human Face," was launched on 21 February 2005. It stresses that one of the main security challenges is for the reconstruction process to generate means to provide services and jobs and protect human rights, especially in rural areas. Using the Gender Development Index (GDI), which combines life expectancy, educational achievements and standard of living indicators, the report shows that Afghan women have one of the lowest GDI indicators in the world. Poverty, illiteracy, limited access to health care and continuous violence against women, call for prompt and effective country-wide action by the Afghan government and the international community.

II. Intergovernmental processes

4. Throughout the reporting period, the situation of women and girls in Afghanistan was examined in various United Nations forums, including the General Assembly, the Security Council, and two functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council (the Commission on the Status of Women and the Commission on Human Rights).

5. In their discussions of the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security, the Security Council and the General Assembly addressed the preparations for the parliamentary and local elections, including the nomination of women candidates, challenges in the institution-building, justice sector and security sector reform processes and economic recovery. The related Secretary-General's reports² stressed that the security situation continued to be of paramount concern with violence on the increase and the pervasive drug economy posing a significant threat to the long-term security and development of Afghanistan.

6. The General Assembly adopted resolution A/RES/60/32 A-B, which applauded the substantive progress achieved in the empowerment of women in Afghan politics. The General Assembly reiterated the continued importance of the full and equal participation of women in all spheres of Afghan life, including in the development, recovery and reconstruction programmes. It called for the full respect of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all, without discrimination of any kind, including on the basis of gender, ethnicity or religion, in accordance with obligations under the Afghan Constitution and international law, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). It strongly condemned incidents of discrimination and violence against women and girls.

7. On 27 October 2005, on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) on women, peace and security, the Security Council held an open debate on the theme “Women’s Participation in Peace Processes.” Invited to address the Council, the country director of Women for Women International Afghanistan noted³ that significant progress had been made in terms of de jure rights for women and increased political participation. She described the serious challenges, including threats, forced/early marriages and other types of violence facing women, when trying to exercise their rights. She emphasized that strengthening of the rule of law and the empowerment of women through capacity building, education, information sharing and access to resources, required the international community’s sustained support and attention.

8. The High Commissioner for Human Rights noted in her report⁴ to the General Assembly that the human rights situation in the country remained of great concern. The report called for, inter alia, concrete measures to address the widespread and persistent human rights violations against women and girl children, including forced/early marriages, crimes against the person and discrimination in the justice system.

9. The independent expert of the Commission on Human Rights on the situation of human rights in Afghanistan reported,⁵ inter alia, violations of women's rights by the State and discrimination related to an array of social practices. He recommended that the Government continue to create comprehensive and sustainable policies to improve the situation of women and children, with special attention to health, education, economic opportunities and political empowerment, and consider women's rights and children's rights in all aspects of policy planning and implementation.

III. Elections

10. For the first time since 1988, parliamentary elections were held for the Wolesi Jirga (House of the People), the lower house of the Afghan National Assembly, on 18 September 2005, as well as provincial council elections. The elections had been originally scheduled for June 2004 in tandem with the presidential vote, but had to be postponed twice for logistical and security reasons. In accordance with the Constitution, on 24 January 2005, President Karzai established the Independent Electoral Commission (IEC), consisting of six men and three women, representing different ethnic groups. IEC, assisted by international electoral experts, who together constituted the Joint Electoral Management Body (JEMB) overseeing the organization of the elections. The JEMB established a Gender Section, which worked closely with departments of the JEMB such as Public Outreach and Training and Capacity Building. During the electoral process, the Gender Section was mandated to provide support for women candidates, voters and organizations in preparation for the elections.

11. Despite enhanced security measures, violence was rife during the election campaign. In the south and the east of the country, Taliban forces reemerged and tried to disrupt the Wolesi Jirga and provincial council elections albeit with little success, while in other areas local military commanders attempted to influence election results and intimidated voters and women candidates. Seven parliamentary candidates and six election workers were killed during the two-month campaign prior to Election Day. Two hundred and eighty-six candidates, including 51 women, voluntarily withdrew their candidacy,⁶ some citing security concerns.

12. Women made up 41.6 per cent of the total 12.5 million voters who registered in 2004 and 2005. Overall, 43 per cent of the women registered to vote actually cast a ballot. An estimated 6 million of some 12.5 million eligible voters cast their ballots, far fewer than the 8 million voters who had participated in the presidential election in October 2004. Two thousand, seven hundred and fifty-three candidates, 12 per cent of whom were women, stood for election to the Wolesi Jirga for a five-year term.

13. As required under the Constitution, women gained 68 (27 per cent) of the 249 seats in the Wolesi Jirga. In Herat, a woman candidate received the most votes out of 17 candidates. Women also secured 121 (29 per cent) out of the 420 seats in the provincial councils. Five provincial seats reserved for women will remain vacant due to lack of women candidates in three provinces, while two Provincial Council seats were won in Kabul in addition to the reserved seats for women.

14. The Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC) and the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA) produced three Joint Verification of Political Rights reports for the Wolesi Jirga and Provincial Council Elections during the period from 19 April to 13 September.⁷ As far as the types of violations and incidents that constrained the exercise of political rights during the nomination and campaign periods, the reports noted that women candidates had been the target of a number of acts of discrimination, intimidation and violent attacks in some areas. However, this did not prevent the majority of women candidates from undertaking campaign activities nor did it discourage women voters from attending political events and rallies. In many areas, local authorities and police had been particularly responsive to women's security concerns and provided them with guards upon request. A majority of women candidates reported that lack of financial resources and transportation posed serious impediments to their campaigning activities.

15. A Gender Elections Task Force (ETF) was established in March 2004, as a subgroup of the Advisory Group on Gender (AGG).⁸ The ETF regrouped in early 2005 to focus on women's participation in the September elections. In March 2005, the ETF submitted to the Independent Electoral Commission gender-sensitive amendments to the electoral law. In the run-up for elections, the ETF addressed the obstacles facing women candidates in campaigning and security of female candidates.

16. To increase women's participation in the elections and ensure their security, separate polling stations were set up for women. Out of a total 26,243 polling stations throughout Afghanistan, 11,387 were for women.⁹ In some parts of the country, The Afghan National Police and Army received special training for the elections. To alleviate security concerns of women candidates, voters and civil educators, UNAMA worked with the Ministry of Interior, the Ministry of Women's Affairs, and chiefs of police in the provinces, alerting them to situations where women have been at risk.

17. The Women's Political Preparatory Committee (WPCC), established in April 2004, focused on activities promoting women's political participation and women in leadership positions. The Committee was composed of women members of political parties, women members of the Constitutional Loya Jirga and women from civil society. The Committee provided training workshops, manuals and documents, logistical support as well as advice. The United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM), National Democratic Institute, Friedrich Ebert Stiftung German Development Service in Afghanistan and the German Development Cooperation, provided support and advice to the Committee.

18. In August 2005, the Committee submitted to the presidential office, a list of potential women candidates for the Presidential Appointees list. Out of a total of 102 seats in the Meshrano Jirga (House of Elders), the upper house of the National Assembly, 34 were appointed by the President. Half of those seats were reserved for women as stipulated in article 84 of the Constitution. Of the remaining 68 elected Meshrano Jirga members, six are women, two of whom hold permanent seats, while the other four hold temporary ones. The total number of women members of the Meshrano Jirga, including the presidential appointees is 23, amounting to 22 per cent of the total membership.

IV. Activities of the Ministry of Women's Affairs

19. During the reporting period, further steps were taken to strengthen the institutional capacity of the Ministry of Women's Affairs (MoWA) and its 34 provincial offices. MoWA continued to support the Government's policy to advance the role of women, including by providing assistance and guidance to line ministries in efforts to integrate gender perspectives into their work programmes and budgets. MoWA also oversaw the implementation of CEDAW and worked closely with UNAMA and political parties to promote women's political participation and to assist women candidates in the elections.

20. With technical assistance from the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the UNAMA Gender Unit, MoWA has played a leading role to ensure gender mainstreaming in the follow-up to and implementation of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The Ministry participated actively in consultations with key line ministries on the Afghan MDG targets and indicators to ensure that Afghan women's needs and priorities were taken into consideration. MoWA also received technical support from UNIFEM in the development of a National Action Plan for Women, framed along the lines of the 12 critical areas of concern of the Beijing Platform for Action. Efforts are underway to ensure that the National Action Plan for Women is endorsed by the Government and integrated into the National Development Strategy, to be reflected in institutional budgets and implemented by line ministries. The National Action Plan is currently being finalized.

21. In December 2004, UNAMA and MoWA signed an implementation agreement for the project 'Capacity Building of Provincial Departments of Women's Affairs (DoWA).' The project covers 15 provinces of Afghanistan. Its aim is to contribute to the improved capacity of the Government to respond to the needs of women and girls. Within the frame of the project, one national and three regional workshops on women's political participation were organized prior to the elections and transportation was provided to ten provincial DoWAs. The project is scheduled for completion in the spring 2006.

22. In April 2005, UNAMA and UNDP assisted MoWA in drafting recommendations to the Head of the Afghan Civil Service Commission and the Minister of Justice on the proposed civil service law. The recommendations addressed structural disadvantages faced by women in recruitment and hiring processes for senior civil service positions. They also incorporated gender equality provisions in promotions and remuneration policies.

23. With the support of UNDP, MoWA continued its efforts to institutionalize its gender-training programme, by working with the Civil Service Commission to make gender training an integral part of the civil service training. National programmes, such as the National Solidarity Programme, have also been approached. Throughout the reporting period, a total of 635 staff members from different ministries have been trained through MoWA's inter-ministerial gender training programme.

24. With the assistance of UNIFEM, MoWA monitors government action on the implementation of the gender provisions in ‘The Way Ahead: Work Plan of the Afghanistan Government’ presented at the Berlin Conference last year, which explicitly states the Government’s commitments to address the needs of women in the economic, health and education sectors, and promote their participation in civil service.

25. In response to President Karzai’s instruction to the Cabinet for giving immediate attention to the nine poorest provinces of Nooristan, Zabul, Panjsher, Daikundi, Badghis, Uruzgan, Paktia, Samangan and Ghor earlier this year, MoWA, with the support of UNDP, prepared and carried out a survey in May 2005, assessing the needs and priorities of women in those provinces. The report addressed priorities in four areas: legal status, education, health and economy. As a follow-up, on the instruction of the Cabinet, each ministry was tasked to prepare a work plan for responding to the needs and priorities of women in these provinces.

26. MoWA has continued to coordinate and implement advocacy campaigns on women’s rights and violence against women in connection with International Women’s Day, 8 March 2005 and the International Day for the Elimination of Violence against Women, 25 November 2005, with the support of United Nations entities, including UNDP.

V. Violence against women and access to justice

A. Violence against women

27. In July 2005, Special Rapporteur on Violence Against Women, appointed by the Commission on Human Rights, carried out a fact-finding mission to Afghanistan. She held meetings with government officials, members of the judiciary, prosecutors, police officers, doctors, and representatives of non-governmental and international organizations in Kabul, Kandahar and Herat. She also visited prisons and shelters for women and received testimonies from women victims of violence. In her press statement of 18 July 2005 the Special Rapporteur noted that although considerable change in the legal and institutional framework concerning the situation of women in Afghanistan had occurred in the past three and a half years, violence against women remained dramatic in its intensity and pervasiveness in the public and private spheres of life. In particular, she highlighted widespread forced and child marriages as one of the primary sources of violence against women.

28. The Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission (AIHRC) estimates that between 60 and 80 per cent of marriages in the country are forced marriages. Many of those marriages, especially in rural areas involve girls below the age of 15. Recent reports indicate that child marriages make up more than 40 per cent of all marriages in Afghanistan.¹⁰ In addition to early and forced marriages, domestic violence, sexual violence, kidnapping, forced seclusion, so-called honour killings, exchange of girls and women for debt or feud (bad), continued to be a major part of women's and girls' lives in Afghanistan and remained one of the pervasive barriers to women's empowerment and gender equality. The lack of adequate support and responses to women victims of violence has been linked to the high rate of incidents of self-immolation across the country. In Herat alone, there were 75 reported cases of self-immolation during 2005. Women are often discouraged or forbidden from pursuing activities outside the home (pardah). Cases of forced prostitution and trafficking among foreign women and Afghan women and children were also reported in 2005.

29. On 6 June 2005, an Inter-Ministerial Task Force to Eliminate Violence against Women was established by presidential decree. The Taskforce, which is led by MoWA, is made up of high-level Afghan officials from the AIHRC, the Supreme Court, the Attorney General's Office, the Ministries of Pilgrimage, Information and Culture, Public Health, Foreign Affairs, Refugees, Interior, and Education, and the Afghan Women Judges Association. The Task Force is mandated to supervise and coordinate action and policy on violence against women at the national level. To this end, it developed a three-month plan of work, identifying strategies and actions to improve the response of the judicial and law enforcement systems. The Task Force's recommendations included training of court officials, the Attorney General's Office and Police departments on handling cases of violence against women.

30. The UNAMA Human Rights Unit has monitored and investigated cases of violence against women and intervened in situations where women have been at risk and brought them to safe places. The legal department of MoWA, with the support of UNIFEM, has developed a national directory listing agencies and organizations providing support services to women victims of violence.

31. UNIFEM supported the establishment of a consultative group on violence against women comprising representatives of civil society and Government to advocate and work for the elimination of violence against women. UNIFEM also provided technical and financial support to civil society organizations promoting women's rights and providing legal services.

32. On 7 February 2005, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) signed a partnership agreement with AIHRC to enhance its returnee monitoring capacity, including monitoring, documenting, reporting and intervening in human rights abuses and violations, including violence against women.

33. Through its women-at-risk programme, UNHCR continued to support Afghan women NGOs providing support to women in difficult circumstances and in need of medical, psychological and legal support. Three safe houses or shelters, run by Afghan women NGOs, two in Kabul and one in Herat were supported. The women in the shelters are often unaccompanied deportees and women escaping from forced marriages (often with much older men), domestic violence and so-called honor killings. While in many cases, solutions can be found through mediation, family-reunification, intervention of the authorities, or legal and psychological counseling, others have no option but to live in the shelter for a prolonged period. Women residing in the shelter have been offered income generating opportunities following educational and professional training. However, it is difficult for single Afghan women without male family support to live independent lives outside shelters.

34. Serious challenges in addressing issues related to violence against women in Afghanistan remain. The vast majority of cases of violence against women are unreported and when they are reported, there is inadequate or non-existing protection or remedy. Psycho-social support and mental health services to women survivors of violence and harmful traditional practices are very limited. Violence in the private sphere is perceived as a family issue and women and girls who experience violence are either unable or afraid to report the problem to the authorities. If they leave their family environment they risk criminal charges, incarceration, and stigmatization from the community. Furthermore, the limited information available indicates that only in very rare cases do perpetrators face any sanctions. This is illustrated by the absence of criminal charges against those who marry under-aged girls, in all regions of the country. Therefore, the initiatives by the government and other actors, including through the Inter-Ministerial Task Force, are of critical importance and should be further supported, strengthened, and monitored.

B. Human rights, transitional justice and the rule of law

35. The Independent Expert on the Situation of Human Rights in Afghanistan noted in his report to the Commission on Human Rights,¹¹ a justice deficit at almost every level of society in Afghanistan. It drew attention to the severe limitation to women's access to justice. The discrimination against women in the justice system was also highlighted in the report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to the General Assembly.¹²

36. The Ministry of Justice, the Attorney General's Office and the Supreme Court, with the technical advice and support of UNDP and UNAMA, are in the process of finalizing a strategic reform framework for the justice sector entitled "Justice for All." It includes a detailed plan setting out priorities, benchmarks, timelines and costs. It is envisaged that once accomplished, this framework would guide future reform efforts and donor investments. The "Justice for All" policy paper acknowledges the situation of Afghan women who are severely disadvantaged under the existing legal system and calls for concerted action to protect women's rights. It further raises concerns with respect to the treatment of women and children under the justice system and recommends that the traditional justice system should comply with national laws and international legal standards. The final draft of "Justice for All" was transmitted to the Cabinet in September 2005 for endorsement.

37. The limited legal qualification of a majority of judges in Afghanistan has severely affected the quality of decisions being rendered. In effect, this often amounts to denial of justice. Accordingly, the capacity and qualification of the judiciary requires sustained attention. It is critical that attention is paid to the qualification of prospective candidates to the judiciary. It is noted that women still remain grossly under-represented in the judiciary, making up only seven per cent of the total number of judges in Afghan courts. The upcoming presidential appointment of Supreme Court judges which would take place following the inauguration of the Parliament offers an opportunity for corrective action to be taken.

38. UNDP, in close partnership with Afghan judicial institutions, has commenced the implementation of a new 'Access to Justice' project, aimed at providing information about the justice system to rural communities. The project will include legal awareness programmes and capacity-building for religious and community leaders.

39. The Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission's (AIHRC) Transitional Justice Programme, aims at enhancement of respect for human rights and promotion of national reconciliation. Under this Programme, human rights abuses are documented, evidence of violations collected and methods for establishing accountability for past crimes are developed through a nation-wide consultation process. Based on the 2005 AIHRC report "A Call for Justice", an Action Plan for Peace, Justice and Reconciliation was developed to implement a national strategy for transitional justice. The strategy includes five elements: acknowledgement of the suffering of the Afghan people; ensuring credible and accountable state institutions; truth-seeking and documentation; promotion of reconciliation; and the establishment of meaningful and effective accountability mechanisms. However, the Action Plan did not envisage amnesty for war crimes, crimes against humanity and other gross human rights violations. The Action Plan was adopted by the Cabinet in December 2005.

40. The Women's Rights Unit of AIHRC has continued to monitor and raise awareness about the promotion and protection of women's human rights, focusing on support to women's active participation in truth-seeking and reconciliation processes

41. The Government decided to take a comprehensive approach to human rights reporting. The project ‘Capacity Building for Sustained Human Rights Treaty Reporting in Afghanistan’ was officially launched in Kabul on 27 November 2005. The project will be carried out by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in cooperation with other relevant line ministries. It aims at enhancement of the Government’s capacity to report on the implementation of human rights treaties to which Afghanistan is party. The project encourages the participation of women’s organizations and the collection of gender sensitive data as part of its database. In April 2005, UNAMA, with the collaboration of UNIFEM and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs carried out a workshop for civil society organizations on CEDAW shadow reporting. The Division for the Advancement of Women of the Department of Economic and Social Affairs (DAW/DESA), is planning a technical assistance mission to Afghanistan in 2006 to provide specific guidance and support on the reporting and implementation of CEDAW.

42. The Legal Department of the MoWA has provided training for defense attorneys on legal services for women and conducted research on customary practices undermining women’s human rights. A mapping exercise has been undertaken to determine whether laws are in line with the Constitution and international legal frameworks. The establishment of family courts throughout the different regions, the setting up of a database on legal cases as a monitoring tool for the efficiency of the justice apparatus in dealing with women’s cases and the application of international legal provisions have been encouraged. These activities constitute important contributions to current legal reform initiatives in Afghanistan. The reforms underway must take into account women's legal rights including under the family and personal status laws.

43. There is continued concern about the situation of women in detention and the issue of illegal detention. The Prison and Detention Centre Law established on 31 May 2005 stipulated that men and women in detention should be in separate facilities with special attention to women with children. The United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime provided support in drafting the new Prisons and Detention Centre Law and has taken steps to ensure that new premises would be built with due attention to the needs of women, particularly women with children. Where there are no local detention facilities, women accused of crimes have reportedly been placed in 'private detention,' usually in the house of the head of a village, where they are treated as prisoners and forced to work for the family. There are also reports of women arbitrarily detained when reporting crimes perpetrated against them, for violating social mores and as substitutes for their husbands or male relatives who have been convicted of crimes.¹³ Women and girls have also been detained for 'running away,' an offence which has no basis in statutory law. These cases often have their roots in forced marriages or violence.¹⁴

44. The Human Rights Unit of UNAMA has continued to monitor the situation of women in detention and has advocated for the release of women in cases of arbitrary or illegal detention.

45. UNDP, through its Law and Order Trust Fund for Afghanistan, supported the Ministry of Interior to rebuild the national civilian police force, including through a project with a special focus on gender issues and women's rights and the recruitment of women police officers. In March 2005, a gender advisor with experience in police organizations commenced work in the Ministry of Interior. The gender advisor developed a departmental gender mainstreaming action plan to support the recruitment, development and promotion of women within the Afghan National Police Force, which to date have been carried out with limited success. Among other steps taken to enhance the recruitment of women into the police, a women's residence with facilities for children has been established at the National Police Academy in Kabul.

46. At present, the Afghan National Police have only one Family Intervention Unit with an emergency telephone number to receive complaints from women victims of violence. Operated on a pilot basis and under-resourced, it is located in Kabul and staffed by women police officers. It is hoped that similar facilities would open in other regions.

VI. Social and economic reconstruction and rehabilitation

A. Health

47. Health indicators for women in Afghanistan remain unsatisfactory. The maternal mortality ratio, in particular, remains one of the highest in the world at 1,600 deaths per 100,000 live births. The fertility rate is high at 6.6 children per woman. Almost half the deaths among Afghan women in reproductive ages are from complications of pregnancy and childbirth. About 87 percent of the maternal deaths are preventable. Life expectancy is low; for women it is estimated at 44 years. Estimates indicate that only 40 per cent of the population has access to basic health facilities. The opportunities for psychosocial support are almost non-existent. According to a 2004 report by the Government, only 23 per cent of the population have access to safe water and only 12 per cent have access to adequate sanitation. Recent figures on tuberculosis (TB) indicate that over 60 per cent of new TB patients are women.

48. United Nations entities, including the World Health Organization (WHO), the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and UNIFEM, and international NGOs and donors have increased efforts to support the Government to reduce maternal mortality and provide health services to women. Steps taken include public awareness campaigns, efforts to increase access to health care and health information, and training of women health providers. Fifty community midwives in the Bamyan and Badakhshan provinces are currently being trained and 20 women in the Takhar and Samangan provinces have received health and hygiene education. After completion of training, these women will reach out with health information to women and girls through house-to-house visits.

49. Technical and policy support has also been provided to the Ministry of Public Health in the establishment of norms and standards for maternal and newborn health care. As a support to training in emergency obstetric care, WHO has, to date, provided 3000 copies of the manual, “Managing Complications in Pregnancy and Childbirth” in Dari, which has been endorsed by the Ministry of Public Health as the National Standard Training Manual for Emergency Obstetrics Care. WHO is also supporting the Ministry of Public Health to improve the family planning programme. A target to eliminate maternal and neonatal tetanus by the end of 2007 has been set and immunization campaigns have continued. UNFPA has worked with the Ministry to set up a Reproductive Health Unit.

50. The United Nations Theme Group on HIV/AIDS, led by UNICEF, is supporting the Government to develop community awareness programmes that improve access to quality HIV/AIDS information and services, with a special focus on at risk groups, including women and girls. The United Nations Country Team has agreed that one of the priorities of the 2006 – 2008 United Nations Development Assistance Framework will be the development of a multi-sectoral approach to HIV/AIDS/STIs, involving the Government and civil society, including community based organizations, religious leaders and the media. This will include a specific focus on how HIV and AIDS are affecting women and girls.

51. Enhanced and coordinated efforts are urgently needed to improve women’s access to health services, particularly reproductive health services, and to support the Government to meet its goal of reducing maternal mortality by 25 percent by 2008. Insecurity and lack of female doctors still prevent many women to seek health care. Corrective action must address these as well.

B. Education

52. While a significant campaign to increase primary school enrollments has raised the enrollment of girls to almost 40 per cent, compared to 67 per cent for boys, overall school enrollment among girls remains among the lowest in the world, with less than 10 percent of girls enrolled in secondary school. Dramatic disparities in enrollment between regions and urban and rural areas remain, with girls representing less than 15 per cent of the total enrollment in nine provinces in the east and the south. Schools also continue struggling with high drop-out rates, and serious teacher shortages, especially female teachers. In the Uruzgan province, for example, there are no female teachers at all. It is estimated that 86 per cent or approximately 4.85 million women in Afghanistan between the ages 15 – 49 are illiterate compared to 57 per cent men. The high illiteracy rate among working age women has numerous adverse effects on domestic health, children's education levels, and overall economic development.

53. Several United Nations entities, including the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organizations (UNESCO), UNFPA, UNICEF, and the World Food Programme (WFP) have invested in girls' education and women's literacy training as a means of reducing gender disparities and promoting the advancement of women. In its efforts to support the education sector, UNICEF has trained more than 50,000 teachers, set up temporary learning spaces, assisted in the development of a new curriculum and provided teaching and learning materials to more than 4.7 million school children. In June 2004, the Director-General of UNESCO and the Afghan Minister of Education signed an Aide

Memoire with a focus on capacity-building in the areas of teacher training, curriculum reform, technical and vocational education and training, and literacy. A Strategic Action Plan for the Development of Higher Education in Afghanistan has also been prepared jointly with the Ministry of Higher Education.

54. Through its school feeding operation, which targets over 1.2 million children, WFP has continued to contribute to the enhancement of children's school attendance. Girls receive an additional take-home ration of vegetable oil as an incentive for families to continue to send girls to school. In areas of acute or chronic food insecurity, and/or inaccessible areas, WFP provides a monthly take-home ration of wheat to both girls and boys. To address the shortage of teachers especially in remote areas, WFP provides food support to both in-service teachers and teacher trainees. WFP also implemented 59 Non Formal Education and literacy training courses in 2005 reaching 18,199 trainees. Vulnerable women such as female heads of households and widows were specifically targeted for these initiatives.

55. The Government and the United Nations Country Team have established a joint programme on Women's Integrated Functional Literacy, under which measurable progress in the literacy rate of women is expected by 2008. The government also aims for 100 per cent enrollment as part of the MDG targets for 2015, with girls' enrollment at 50 per cent. The government faces challenges to the achievement of this goal, for example lack of school facilities, particularly girls' schools in rural areas. The challenge is more formidable with regard to girls' secondary schools, which are very few and scattered. Other challenges, such as insecurity, distances to schools, poverty, lack of female teachers, negative attitudes to girls' education and early marriages remain. Armed factions opposed to the Government have also targeted girls' schools and carried out terrorist attacks such as bombings or burning down schools and campaigning against female education.

56. UNESCO and UNDP are currently engaged in negotiations with the MoWA and Kabul University to set up a Women/Gender Studies Institute at the University of Kabul. In addition to its academic and research functions, the Institute will contribute, inter alia, to the policy objectives outlined in the Beijing Platform for Action, the MDGs, and CEDAW.

C. Economic empowerment and poverty reduction

57. The economic empowerment of women is critical for Afghanistan's sustained recovery, reconstruction and development. The traditional role of women in Afghanistan is, however, a constraint to their equitable participation in economic activities. Female wage labour is still viewed as a solution of last resort for households in desperate straits, and their wage rates are normally only half the level of men's or less. Women's involvement in the formal sector has mainly been urban-based, mostly as civil servants in the health and education sectors. In agricultural production women have continued to play an important role. While most of women's labour remains non-monetized, they make major labour contributions to a number of marketed products such as dried fruits, fuel wood, dairy products and handicrafts. However, even when women's domestic production such as carpet weaving forms the main income of the household, they rarely control the marketing of these products, which is most often managed by male relatives or middle men.

58. Several United Nations entities, including the International Labour Organization (ILO), UNDP, WHO, WFP and UNIFEM, as well as NGOs have continued to target women within the framework of different income-generation, employment and skills development projects, including the Employment Service Centre project, the Recovery and Employment Afghanistan Programme, the Afghan Microfinance for Employment Project, and the National Skills Development & Market Linkages Programme (NSD & MLP). In its training programmes for national staff, ILO provided technical assistance to ensure that gender perspectives were integrated into all aspects of the programmes. In its efforts to promote a rights-based approach to economic recovery, ILO has translated and disseminated fundamental labour standards as well as the ILO's 'ABC on Women Workers Rights' and raised awareness about their content in workshops held with workers and employers organizations. ILO has also developed a Re-entry of Afghan Women into the Labour Market project, which seeks to facilitate the re-entry of urban and rural women into the labour market. The Afghan Women's Business Council, supported by UNIFEM, has continued to assist women to market their products.

59. The Advisory Group on Gender has underlined the need to re-examine national poverty reduction programmes in order to sharpen their focus on women, particularly the economic empowerment of vulnerable groups such as widows, rural women living in remote communities with non-existent economic opportunities, and female headed households, and ensure that constraints faced by women in accessing poverty reduction initiatives, including initiatives focused on skills development and employment, are identified and removed. Issues of land and property reform also require particular attention to ensure that the needs and rights of vulnerable groups, including households headed by women, are protected.

D. Return of refugees and internally displaced persons

60. On 30 August 2005, Afghanistan acceded to the 1951 Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol, which marks a significant step towards recovery.

61. Between 1 January and 31 August 2005 a total of 367,694 Afghans were assisted by UNHCR to return to Afghanistan voluntarily, the majority returning from Pakistan (327,809 persons) and Iran (39,885). Of these, 181,276 were girls and women, mainly returning from Pakistan. In addition to assisted returns, there were significant numbers of Afghans returning spontaneously, particularly from Iran, as well as some forcible returns of largely undocumented Afghans. Among those forcibly returned from Iran since the beginning of 2005, were 65 unaccompanied female Afghans.

62. Afghanistan has been challenged by the influx of returnees, a trend that is likely to persist following the successful holding of elections. As a result, socio-economic investments have to be increased to boost income generation of the population, especially the most vulnerable groups. As most of the returnees settle in urban areas, there has been an estimated six per cent annual growth rate in the urban population.

63. In cooperation with the International Organizations for Migration (IOM) and WFP, UNHCR started the organized return of internally displaced people (IDPs) in May 2005, mainly from southern and western Afghanistan. Given the sizeable number of IDPs who, by now, are generating their own income, efforts to enhance self-sufficiency are also reinforced.

64. Shelter continued to be one of the highest requests by returnees. Forty-six per cent of the shelter beneficiaries are women. UNHCR has taken steps to ensure the involvement of women in implementation of the shelter project and projects related to health, water and employment.

VII. Coordination of United Nations and donor assistance

65. The third annual Afghanistan Development Forum (ADF) was held in Kabul from 4 to 6 April 2005, with the participation of over 300 delegates from the Government and the international donor community. The Advisory Group on Gender had prepared a background note for the ADF, which drew attention to a number of areas identified by MoWA as key to improving the overall status of Afghan women, namely: health, education, legal protection, economic empowerment, eradication of violence against women, and women's participation in politics and public life. The presentations and discussions at the ADF fed into the development of the Interim National Development Strategy to be presented at an international donors conference expected to take place in London in January 2006. The National Development Strategy will integrate follow-up to and implementation of the Millennium Development Goals.

66. The UNAMA Gender Unit continued to support and facilitate gender mainstreaming, including through designated gender focal points in UNAMA's regional offices and close collaboration with the Provincial Departments of Women's Affairs (DoWAs). Since 2002, the Unit has been coordinating an information and knowledge-sharing network for the United Nations Country Team gender focal points. Early in 2005 UNAMA revitalized the network of gender focal points as an advocacy mechanism and forum for information exchange. Several training activities for both international and national staff were organized and facilitated with a focus on gender awareness and sensitization as part of a mission policy to incorporate gender perspectives into all programmes and operations. Subjects covered included gender mainstreaming, women's rights, standards of conduct and gender and diversity. Assistance and facilitation were also offered to United Nations agencies on demand. In addition, custom-made trainings were provided to respond to specific mission training needs. The UNAMA Gender Unit also developed a specific gender module for the civil administrators training programme of the Independent Administrative Reform and Civil Service Commission.

67. In June 2005, the UNAMA Gender Unit presented to the United Nations Operations Managers Team a gender balance action plan, which includes the goal to collect sex-disaggregated data on the composition of United Nations entities' national and international staff.

68. Different United Nations entities and international organizations, including ILO, UNDP, WFP, and WHO have made special efforts for mainstreaming gender in their work in Afghanistan, including in their technical and financial support to line ministries.

69. In August 2005, UNAMA launched a mission-wide information campaign and mandatory staff training programme on prevention of and response to sexual exploitation and abuse and sexual harassment.

VIII. Conclusion and recommendations

70. With the elections to the Wolesi Jirga (House of the People) resulting in 27 per cent women's representation in national parliament and 29 per cent in the provincial councils, Afghan women's participation in the public life has significantly increased. Among other gains made by women during the post-Bonn transition are the following: greater awareness of gender equality issues within the Government and the public at large; further steps made to reduce child and maternal mortality and improve access to education and literacy of women and girls. The Government has increasingly addressed matters previously considered private, such as violence against women. These changes show that, provided with space and support from outside, Afghan women have demonstrated their capacity to engage constructively in public life and make their contribution to peace and development.

71. Despite these gains, women and girls in Afghanistan face formidable security, human rights, social and economic challenges. Security situation and basic human rights conditions remain poor in many parts of the country, especially outside of Kabul. Armed factions, including remaining Taliban forces, routinely abuse women's human rights. Many advances by women in economy, employment and education are offset by the continuing effects of widespread poverty. Continuing discrimination against women in access to education, healthcare, land, credits, productive means stifle reconstruction and development efforts.

72. For the post-transitional period, promoting an inclusive, participatory and gender equal society that responds to the aspirations of all Afghan women and men continues to offer the best prospect for improving the overall security and development situation. The steps taken by the Afghan government with support and advice from United Nations entities to date, towards this end, are commendable and need to be further strengthened. The major challenge is to build on and sustain positive changes that resulted from the transition. Prompt and effective action on behalf of the Afghan Government, civil society and the international community is needed to promote and protect the human rights of women and girls and end gender-based discrimination. Economic and social assistance programmes need to build on women's acquired de jure rights, encourage women to participate in the public life and new economic tasks and activities and ensure more gender balance in accessing productive resources and labour markets.

73. To these ends, the Commission on the Status of Women may wish to consider the following recommendations, in addition to those made in previous reports on this subject most of which are still valid:

(a) To the Government of Afghanistan:

- i) Endorse the National Action Plan on gender equality in compliance with the Beijing Platform for Action, ensure that it is sufficiently resourced across all sectors and fully implemented in consultation with women’s civil society organizations.
- ii) Take urgent measures to ensure the protection of civilians, particularly women and children.
- iii) Strengthen the rule of law and the reform of the justice system, including through training of the judiciary and police; amend or abolish discriminatory laws, regulations, customs and practices; and criminalize violence against women and girls, including domestic violence.
- iv) Take specific measures to improve women’s access to justice, including through expanding the establishment of family courts and the recruitment and training of women in all Afghan courts.

- v) Develop effective gender sensitive strategies for investigating allegations of violations of women’s human rights and of international humanitarian law and facilitate the provision of remedies to the victims and bring perpetrators to justice.

- vi) Strengthen measures to prevent and respond to sexual and gender-based violence and develop support services, including health and psycho-social services and the establishment of Family Intervention Units across the country.

- vii) Release prisoners held in the State detention centres for actions that do not constitute crimes under Afghan law, prohibit the confinement of women in the custody of private individuals; and provide them with adequate support for reintegration into their communities;

- viii) Take resolute action to achieve measurable improvement in the social and economic situation of women and girls in Afghanistan, including through:
 - a) empowering women and girls economically and politically, including through sustainable capacity-building initiatives;

- b) supporting fully the equal right of women to work and strengthening efforts to promote their reintegration in employment in all sectors and at all levels of Afghan society;
 - c) ensuring equal access to land and other productive assets;
 - d) improving access to health services and health information;
 - e) increasing efforts to reduce and eliminate women's illiteracy; ensuring the full enrollment and retention of girls in primary education, increasing girls' attendance in secondary schools and higher education; training of female teachers and eliminating of discrimination against girls in school;
 - f) and establishing monitoring mechanisms of the progress achieved.
- ix) Strengthen efforts to promote and facilitate the full, effective and equal participation of women at all levels and all spheres of Afghan life, including in decision-making at all levels.
- (b) To the United Nations system, donor Governments and civil society
 - i) Ensure that the necessary resources are allocated to mainstream gender perspectives into all policies and programmes; that staff have the capacity and necessary tools to support them; and that targeted initiatives aimed at the empowerment of women and girls receive sufficient funding;

- ii) Provide technical and financial support for reform and the strengthening of the judicial sector, including through merit-based recruitment ensuring that qualified women are given equal consideration in the process, training of judicial officers, and rehabilitation of the infrastructure;
- iii) Continue to provide technical expertise and resources to the Ministry of Women’s Affairs, line ministries and all governmental bodies in their efforts to mainstream gender and advance the situation of women and girls;
- iv) Support sustainable capacity-building for Afghan women, including through information-sharing, access to resources, education and training, to enable them to participate fully in all societal sectors;
- v) Fully support the Government in eradicating violence against women.

- vi) Ensure that donor actions supporting gender equality and the advancement of women and girls are more harmonized, transparent and collectively effective.

- vii) Strengthen efforts to collect sex-disaggregated data across all sectors.
