⁷ See also Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, 1999, Supplement No. 7 (E/1999/27), chaps. II and III.

Summary of the general debate by the Commission on the Status of Women at its forty-third session on agenda item 4, "Initiation of the comprehensive review and appraisal of the implementation of the Platform for Action and preparation for the special session of the General Assembly in the year 2000"

1. During the general debate, 21 member States as well as Guyana, on behalf of the Group of 77, and Germany, on behalf of the European Union and Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia, Cyprus and Liechtenstein, addressed agenda item 4, making suggestions related to the special session of the General Assembly to review progress in implementing the Nairobi Forward-looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women and the Beijing Platform for Action.

2. Delegations affirmed their commitment to taking an active part in the preparations for the special session. It was emphasized that the purpose of the special session was not to renegotiate the results of the Fourth World Conference on Women but to chart an informed, action-oriented plan for advancing the goals of the Beijing Platform for Action. One delegation expressed the view that no new issues or concepts should be introduced that might reopen what had been decided at Beijing. Some delegations suggested that cross-cutting themes should be identified. One delegation noted that the cross-cutting themes proposed by the Secretary-General in his report on further actions and initiatives (E/CN.6/1999/PC/2) deserved attention. Two delegations proposed that the review focus on empowerment of women and mainstreaming of a gender perspective at all levels as the framework for the special session. It had been noted, with respect to the routine empowerment of women in political, economic, social and other fields, that this made strong societies in times of peace and mitigated automatic gender abuse in times of civil disruption.

3. It was proposed that the special session review progress made and obstacles encountered in the implementation of all 12 critical areas of concern of the Platform for Action in a comprehensive and holistic manner in order to accelerate implementation. Assessments should identify good practices and lessons learned during implementation, as well as obstacles encountered and addressed. The special session should also identify effective strategies for overcoming obstacles to implementation, as well as further action and initiatives required for implementation. It was suggested that strategies to promote measurable implementation might be grouped into three categories:

(a) Translating political will into action through innovative approaches and allocation of resources;

(b) Building institutional capacity for the empowerment of women, gender equality and gender inclusiveness at the individual and institutional levels;

(c) Engaging civil society and building partnerships among all groups of the population, including partnership and mutual respect between men and women.

4. It was also stressed that where there is poverty and scarcity of resources and where information and communication technology is backward, women feel the brunt of the shortfall. Strategies to promote even levels of development between countries by minimizing the widening gap between rich and poor nations and between rich and poor people were important. Disparities between developed and developing countries should not, however, be a factor inhibiting their collaboration and cooperation in achieving the goals of gender equality.

5. One delegation stated that the five cross-cutting functional areas emphasized in the report of the Secretary-General on further actions and initiatives, namely, political will, capacity-building, accountability and monitoring, cooperation and partnership, and assistance to women and girls currently subject to discrimination and disadvantage, provided an appropriate framework for identifying further actions and initiatives to fulfil commitments made at the Beijing Conference. With respect to the fifth area, there was a need to focus on both strategies to prevent gender discrimination and strategies to protect those subject to discrimination.

6. Some delegations proposed that both the review and appraisal and further actions and initiatives regarding the implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action should be based on mechanisms for measuring qualitative progress in the implementation of women's enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms. It was suggested that benchmarks were needed and that a voluntary benchmarking regime, both qualitative and quantitative, should be developed as a baseline against which progress could be measured. Such a regime could then serve as a tool for the Commission's work during the period 2001–2005.

7. It was stressed that the review should be based on all available sources of information. Several delegations emphasized the importance for the five-year review of the agreed conclusions and resolutions adopted since 1995 by the Commission on the Status of Women on the 12 critical areas of concern of the Beijing Platform for Action. Others suggested drawing on national action plans, responses to the Secretary-General's questionnaire, relevant thematic reports, and reports of States Parties submitted to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. One delegation proposed that consultations be organized inter-sessionally to ensure effective preparations for the special session.

8. A number of delegations stressed the need for active participation of civil society and involvement of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in the preparations for the special session, as well as the need to ensure appropriate arrangements for their contributions to the special session. Active dialogue between NGOs and Governments was also advocated, both at the national and international levels, and it was suggested that Governments include NGOs in their official delegations to the special session. It was pointed out, however, that the primary responsibility for implementing the Beijing Platform for Action rested with Governments, and that political will and commitment at the national and international levels played a critical role in creating the enabling environment necessary for equal treatment and gender mainstreaming.

9. Several delegations emphasized that the outcome of the special session should not be an "academic" exercise. It should be concrete, action-oriented and operational. Several delegations proposed the adoption of a short political declaration to reaffirm the commitments made at Beijing. Strategies to overcome the obstacles encountered in implementation and to identify further actions and initiatives needed for the twenty-first century should be formulated in a short and concise manner and should be attached to the declaration. Some delegations expressed the view that the special session would be an opportunity to look at the future role of the Commission on the Status of Women, including its new long-term programme of work and its working methods.

10. During the discussion, a number of specific issues were identified as constituting challenges for the future or as constituting new developments since 1995. Concern was expressed that progress in implementing the Platform was being hindered by economic and political developments, both globally and nationally. The creation and/or sustaining of an environment conducive to gender equality and the full enjoyment of human rights by all was identified as an emerging challenge. This included globalization and modernization in its many aspects. Many delegates called for re-examining globalization beyond its economic dimensions in order to understand it as a diverse phenomenon that influenced many aspects of women's lives and that might leave women and girls increasingly vulnerable as a result of cutbacks in social services and in the role of the State. Another challenge identified was the implications for women of the ageing of the population. Many endorsed a life-cycle approach to policy and programming. A number of delegations considered the question of partnership between men and women to be a challenge that needed to be addressed, and called for strategies to promote gender relations based on equality, mutual respect and sharing of responsibilities.

11. The need for a strategy to confront various forms of religious fundamentalism that might affect women's enjoyment of their human rights was noted. The importance of a concerted effort to identify obstacles and take action to promote women's leadership role in politics and in all other spheres was also noted. One delegation drew attention to new scientific developments in methods of medically assisted procreation that raised possible questions of protection from potential abuses in the fields of genetic science and research, and had implications for human rights in general and women's rights in particular. Others noted that broader access by women to science and new technologies, including the related employment implications, was an issue to be addressed.

12. Delegates also provided information during the debate on priorities for action to implement the Platform identified at the country level and on policies and programmes put in place to address those priorities. In most cases, the priorities were reflected in their national action plans to implement the Beijing Platform for Action. That information would be valuable as an input into the review and appraisal, which would be presented to the Commission in 2000. A number of delegates addressed the critical areas of women and health and institutional mechanisms for the advancement of women. That aspect of the general debate would be reflected in the summaries on those two critical areas since those critical areas had been addressed in detail during the current session.

Action taken by the Commission acting as Preparatory Committee

7. At its 5th meeting, on 19 March, the Preparatory Committee had before it the text of a draft resolution entitled "Preparations for the special session of the General Assembly entitled 'Women 2000: gender equality, development and peace for the twenty-first century'" (E/CN.6/1999/PC/L.2), submitted by the Chairperson of the Preparatory Committee. The Preparatory Committee also had before it an informal text containing revisions to the draft resolution.

8. The Preparatory Committee was advised that the draft resolution, as revised, contained no programme budget implications.

9. At the same meeting, following statements by the representatives of Algeria, Kenya, Nigeria, Turkey, Antigua and Barbuda, Jamaica and China, the Preparatory Committee recommended the adoption of the draft resolution, as revised, by the General Assembly through the Economic and Social Council (see chap.
