Women and girls, particularly in rural areas, those with disabilities, Indigenous and LGBTQI communities, face multiple and intersecting forms of discrimination exacerbated by the impacts of COVID-19, climate crises, environmental destruction, and conflict due to pre-existing structural inequalities. With Gender-Based Violence and systemic discrimination on the rise, women and girls are often further marginalized through intensified violations of sexual and reproductive health and rights, rising economic, land and food insecurity, and unpaid care and domestic work. Advancing gender equality, preventing violence against women and girls at local, national, and global levels, and promoting women and girls’ participation in decision-making, is fundamental to a just and sustainable COVID-19 recovery.

Special Session: FINANCING OUR FUTURE – SDG 17 (VIDEO)

(Session without interpretation)

3:00 PM – 4:00 PM
The COVID-19 crisis has exposed and exacerbated vulnerabilities and inequalities between and within economies and societies. It also provides once-in-a-generation strategic opportunities to create more resilient and sustainable societies that effectively address issues like climate change, inequality, limited access to education and decent work that especially impact youth and their lifelong trajectories. Such challenges cannot be remedied by governments alone but also require multi-stakeholder partnerships that draw on youth expertise and youth perspectives from all sectors. The global partnership for sustainable development needs to sharpen its focus on the priorities of youth, including more socially responsible and sustainable investment; increasing youth employment and enhancing skills training in key sectors for youth; overcoming the digital divide; and generating and utilising actional data that helps design youth-oriented social and economic policies.
