ICRC
The scope and application of the principle of universal jurisdiction
United Nations General Assembly, 73nd session, Sixth Committee
Statement by the International Committee of the Red Cross
October 2018

Mr / Madam Chair,

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) welcomes the continued interest of the United Nations General Assembly in the principle of universal jurisdiction and takes note of the Secretary-General’s most recent report on this issue, to which we contributed.

The principle of universal jurisdiction is one of the key tools for ensuring that serious violations of international humanitarian law (IHL) are prevented and – when they do occur – are investigated and, if appropriate, repressed.

The 1949 Geneva Conventions provide for the obligation for States Parties to search for suspected perpetrators of grave breaches – which are serious IHL violations – regardless of their nationality, and to either prosecute or extradite them. Protocol I of 1977 additional to the Geneva Conventions extends this obligation to the grave breaches defined therein.

Other international instruments place a similar obligation on States Parties to vest some form of universal jurisdiction in their courts over serious violations of the rules contained in those instruments. These include, for example, the 1954 Hague Convention for the Protection of Cultural property in the Event of Armed Conflict and its Second Protocol (1999), the 1984 Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or punishment and the 2006 International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from enforced Disappearance. In addition, State Practice and opinio juris have helped to consolidate a customary rule whereby States have the right to extend universal jurisdiction to other serious violations of IHL. These include, in particular, serious violations of Article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions of 1949 and of Additional Protocol II of 1977, as well as other serious violations of IHL, including those listed in Article 8 of the 1998 Statute of the International Criminal Court.

Mr / Madam Chair,
States have the primary responsibility for investigating allegations and prosecuting alleged perpetrators of serious violations of IHL. When some States do not take legal action, however, the exercise of universal jurisdiction by other States can serve as an effective mechanism to ensure accountability and limit impunity.

Since its last submission, the ICRC has been informed of 7 additional States that have established some form of universal legislation over serious violations of IHL in their national legal frameworks, bringing the total number to 117. The ICRC has also observed a steady increase in domestic prosecutions based on universal jurisdiction for serious IHL violations. In 2017, national prosecution services have started investigations in over 20 cases, and more than 9 judgments have been delivered by domestic courts on the basis of universal jurisdiction.

Such efforts demonstrate that States are using universal jurisdiction to effectively address prevailing impunity gaps and move towards accountability for serious violations of IHL perpetrated beyond their borders, in past or ongoing armed conflicts. These efforts also send an important message to victims and survivors that accountability is not just an aspirational goal.

Mr / Madam Chair,

As mentioned in previous statements, the ICRC continues to address the issues of preventing and repressing serious IHL violations, by supporting States both in strengthening their national criminal legislation and in establishing universal jurisdiction over serious violations of IHL. We also produce technical documents and practical tools on the application of universal jurisdiction.

The ICRC also still recognizes that there may be challenges to the effective exercise of the principle of universal jurisdiction but recalls once again that, although States may attach conditions to the application of universal jurisdiction to grave breaches or other serious violations of IHL, those conditions must be aimed at increasing the effectiveness and predictability of universal jurisdiction and not at unnecessarily restricting the possibility of bringing suspected offenders to justice.

We will continue to follow, with great interest, the discussion on the principle of universal jurisdiction in the Sixth Committee and in other UN forums. Finally, the ICRC reiterates its readiness to continue engaging with and supporting States’ efforts to ensure greater respect for IHL, including in this area.

Thank you.
