President of the General Assembly
President of the Security Council
United Nations

Dear Sirs:

Let me first congratulate both the General Assembly and the Security Council for the manner in which the selection process of the new Secretary-General has been conducted this year.

We are now less than four months away from the date on which the new Secretary-General must take office. The Security Council has the responsibility to guide the selection process in an orderly and timely manner to its final recommendation, and appointment by the General Assembly. Out of loyalty to the United Nations and in order to facilitate the advance of the selection process I hereby inform you that today I withdraw my candidacy to the position of Secretary-General. I do so with gratitude and with concern.

Deep gratitude to my government and my country, to all other Member States, to civil society and to private sector for the perseverance with which they continue to uphold the values and principles of the United Nations. My gratitude to the staff of the United Nations in headquarters and particularly those in the field. Over the years I have had the privilege of meeting with many Country Teams and recently with numerous military and civilian personnel in UN Peacekeeping Missions. No report can convey the daily challenges faced by them, nor the complexities of the constant dilemmas with which they struggle. Those on the front lines of peace (and most often lack thereof) need our full support.

My concern relates to the magnitude of our collective challenge. My candidacy has been based on the principle that we need to usher in a new era of strengthened multilateralism that brings countries together to collaborate in order to safeguard peace today and at the same time seed the peace of tomorrow. We have entered an age of increasing interdependence, in which the purposeful interweaving of our efforts will be critical to our success as we address challenges ranging from peace, conflict prevention, human rights, migration, disease, depletion of natural resources and climate change. Never before have we had so many issues compounding each other. At the same time, never before have we had such transformational opportunities to advance synergistically for the common good. However, as it has been shown in the climate change negotiations, this will not occur without leadership.

I trust that as the Security Council and the General Assembly move towards the conclusion of this important selection process Member States will be guided by a commitment to provide strong leadership to the United Nations and to the world.

Most cordially,

Christiana Figueres
