Building back better together: Strengthening resilient development through renewable energy

To mitigate the worst impacts of climate change whilst harvesting the benefits associated with implementing Agenda 2030, we need inclusive and participatory decision-making. A transition towards a resilient, sustainable future cannot be implemented by an individual or a single group of people alone.

The billions currently being spent to revitalise our COVID-19 stricken economies will determine our infrastructure for decades to come. We are at a crossroads whether we embark on a sustainable path towards resilience and climate mitigation, or if we continue as before and live beyond planetary boundaries. Renewable energies are the key to a just, resilient and clean future and building back better after the COVID crisis. Access to energy can lift millions of people out of poverty through adding local economic value and job creation, it can help to increase resilience of the agricultural sector through and can ensure energy security through utilising locally available energy resources. Due to their inherent modularity, renewable energies are especially well-suited for this democratisation process: they are cheap, can be installed even in the most remote regions, are sustainable, and provide more green jobs.

Therefore, linking a transdisciplinary, multi-stakeholder approach with renewable energy is the logical next step if we want to protect our planet for future generations.
